Is it safe to cast between the two below in my case where I'm guaranteed that the variable being casted to short or int is always 0-255? short a = 0xA123456; int b = (int)a; A: Is it safe to cast between the two below in my case where I'm guaranteed that the variable being casted to short or int is always 0-255? In your case it is not guaranteed. However, from the C++ FAQ: 3.11 How many values of an int can I safely cast to an int? On a typical implementation the answer is "almost all of them". Most but not all of the values of int are representable as an int, and so the rules for narrowing conversions also apply to this case. The only exceptions are positive and negative zero, the "largest" positive and negative integers, and the special values described in 5.7.2. So, you could safely cast int to short and short to int. Note that C++ specifies that int are exactly 32-bit numbers. Q: Call Python script
